In Crises of Imagination, Crises of Power (Zed Books, forthcoming), I argue that this sense of futility is the residual effect of the way capitalism 'encloses' not only our time, our communities and our environment; but also our imaginations. Enclosure here is a metaphor borrowed from the process by which medieval peasants were dispossessed of their common lands and forced to rely on wage labor for survival.

The current crisis of imagination has limited our conceptual horizon, disabling us as a society from considering and then actualizing other ways of being in the world. A crisis of imagination is not only striking the secular realm of culture and politics, it also impedes the Holy Spirit's working in the church.

A crisis of imagination. Sello Hatang, CE Nelson Mandela Foundation. News. As we have reflected on many times during this year of Covid-19, the virus has surfaced the best and the worst of human imagination and endeavour, and it has disclosed opportunity even as it has both foregrounded and deepened deprivation, despair and the discarding of the desperate.
