Liberalism is derived from two related features of Western culture. The first is the West's preoccupation with individuality, as compared to the emphasis in other civilizations on status, caste, and tradition. Throughout much of history, the individual has been submerged in and subordinate to his clan, tribe, ethnic group, or kingdom.

The distinction between negative and positive freedom was developed further by the liberal theorist T.H. Green. He fully recognised that laws alone cannot make people good, but they can at least enable individuals to make themselves good. T.H. Green thereby reflects a non-utopian view as to what legislation can achieve (in contrast to utopian socialists such as Robert Owen).
